John Banville: Birchwood The big house novel is a staple of Irish literature. It provides a useful framework for showing the differences between the native Irish population and the rich, often English or, if Irish, non-Irish-speaking Protestants. It is also useful, of course, to portray a group of people isolated from the real world.

" Birchwood " by John Banville. Reading 13 October 2009 6 Comments. This book has very clear echoes of Proust, both in the writing style and in the sense of nostalgia that pervades the story of aristocratic decline. The references are clear and deliberate – in the very first chapter, Banville ' s narrator refers to his fragments of memory as " madeleines " and talks of his " search for ...

As you can imagine, my mailbox is quite full this morning from people wondering about my reaction to Michiko Kakutani's takedown of John Banville's The Sea in today's New York Times. While I'd like to oblige everyone and do a Mailer on Kaku, I'm going to surprise you all by not doing that, at least, not in the fashion you probably expect.. There are a few reasons for this.
